(Yesterday I lost my faith in humanity...)

Seriously, we only have ten years. Based off what governments are doing internationally, I say we just riot. By the time most of us can run for offices, it'll be too late. We need to do something. Otherwise, ninty-percent of corals will die, and the Arctic will go ice-free every few years. It's the end of the world as we know it, and I don't feel fine.

Me would be like yeah there darlink want me to prove it to you. and their like yeah grandma, and I am like pours water in a cup, and puts it in the freezer. You know when ii was a kid we had snow, their like yeah right you just put water in the freezer. I make my way to the basement and bring up the last bit of snowballs, that I kept in another freezer, and their like wow Grandma she wasn't lying and grab them and throw them at each other outside. While there doing that I bring the ice out and put it in Glasses of water. Did I mention they would say you old fool after I told them about ice and snow, bring the water outside and they drink it. Then say mmm. Grandma this water is refreshing. I am like darlink because it has ice.

(partly in response to Grendel)

I think everyone has at least some power to help prevent global warming, even if it's really small. Even if you think that just one plastic bag, one syrofoam container won't make much of a difference, remember that all that trash will continue to be around for hundreds of years after you've used them, harming the enviroment and wildlife all the while.

(By the way I recommend Get Real by Mara Rockliff, it's easy to understand, short, and touches a wide vareity of topics)

Hopefully, that far into the future we'll already have established colonies on Mars. This research is a lot farther ahead than you might think. If we're extra lucky (and extra smart), we'll be able to save other species as well. Instead of trying to grasp at the remains of our dying planet, we should get studying with that math homework, get majors in physics or biology, and get jobs with major space innovation organizations. This is the surest way to secure the survival of humanity and even other species.
